Australia's chief privacy commissioner, Timothy Pilgrim, told The Australian newspaper in May that he supported an OECD review to look at a "whole range of privacy matters". A public hearing is set for the summer and there will be 75 submissions from interested parties, such as Amnesty International and other non-government organisations. Under the agreement, Australia will provide a briefing document to the review group by mid-June. The review is set to commence in the first quarter of next year. Pilgrim told The Australian that a review of a "comprehensive range" of privacy law might be undertaken. "It is possible to look at areas such as data retention, surveillance, information security, the ability to inspect providers' records or take other steps. But you would have to be very specific about what you would do," he said. In Australia, the existing Privacy Act 1998 is administered by the Australian Privacy Commission. But with the backdrop of an increase in surveillance by government and law enforcement agencies, an OECD review would also investigate the use of national security laws that grant wide-ranging powers to the government. In addition, the review would investigate the regulation of internet surveillance and data retention by state government agencies. According to the Australian Privacy Foundation, legislation introduced into the Australian parliament last year provides the basis for "joint Australia-US bulk data-retention laws".Victor Davis Hanson is an American military historian and syndicated columnist who has published nine books.
