The "pass motion" experience was first introduced to FIFA with FIFA Street 3 in 2004, and since then has become an integral part of the franchise, powering the FIFA Street series, FIFA 07 and FIFA 11 as well as FIFA 13, FIFA 14 and FIFA 15. With the addition of this feature to FIFA 22, fans will be able to experience "HyperMotion" gameplay for the first time. What makes HyperMotion an important step forward in the evolution of the FUT "pass motion" experience is the capture of real-life footwork data, which focuses on the players' true positions on the pitch and accurately reflects their dynamics during the game. This data is then dynamically replicated in the PlayStation 4, PlayStation 3 and Xbox One versions of FIFA in the form of head-to-head battles that follow the trajectories of real-life players. "With the addition of 'HyperMotion' in FIFA 22, we are delivering players the most authentic and lifelike pass motion experience in the franchise," said Senior Producer Joel Emslie. "Players will instantly feel the impact of the millions of small details that are included in the 'pass motion' experience." Each player is equipped with a motion capture suit that measures his or her six degrees of freedom, which is used to collect data to feed the game engine. All of this data is dynamically replicated to capture a full 360-degree view of the pitch. This data can then be used for both gameplay and visual fidelity improvements across all modes in FIFA 22. Data regarding pass trajectories, the finishing position of the ball, the short passes being made and tackling can be collected in real-time and used to shape gameplay. Not only does this addition to FIFA 22 allow players to better execute passing and shooting motions, but it will allow them to see the ball like never before in "pass motion" gameplay. Below are some examples: HyperMotion Tracing a short pass The ball is played through the legs. Throughout the execution of the pass, the bot is able to track the trajectory of the ball, along with the player's head direction, body direction and motion capture suit. Top-Hat Pass Trace A lot of football is won or lost in the movement off the ball. If the opponent gains possession off your passes, they are almost certainly going to be
