In the first study of its kind, the prevalence of Mycobacterium tuberculosis was investigated in wild-caught rhesus monkeys (Macaca mulatta), and a simple method of detection used. The animals were grouped according to sex and social status, resulting in 4 groups: male adults, male children, female adults, and female children. Monkeys were sampled by pulmonary aspiration, divided into 3 groups according to the intensities of their cough, and cultured on Lowenstein-Jensen medium. TB-1 culture used a combination of media components, while TB-2 culture used Middlebrook's 7H12 medium. TB-3 culture used 0.8% saline solution. The TB-1 group (39 animals) was positive for M. tuberculosis on all medium types (9.4%); TB-2 was positive on Lowenstein-Jensen medium (10.5%) and TB-3 was positive on 2 of the 7H12-based culture media (2.6%). The TB-3 media yielded a higher prevalence rate than TB-1, but the difference was not significant. TB-1 and TB-2 samples were submitted to molecular genotyping via spoligotyping, revealing the existence of some clones of M. tuberculosis in this population. The results indicate that the method is suitable for the detection of M. tuberculosis in captive rhesus monkeys. Moreover, the sample collections could be carried out quickly and easily, opening up numerous possibilities for research on M. tuberculosis in these animals.Q: ?????????? ?????????? ?
